

Culture and Perspective: Connections made between countries through education

A healthy integration of a nation's religion and culture into their education shapes their image and perspective in relation to surrounding countries.

By: Ellery Ekblad

Introduction

- The integration of culture into a nation's education better prepares its students for their intended lifestyle influencing relationships made with surrounding nations.

Countries involved

- Countries in Europe have integrated religion into their education (Example: Cantonal schools (protestant and catholic schools)).
- China integrated various languages into their curricula like English, German, and Spanish.
- This creates connections between the separated regions due to the influence of their perspective of what can benefit the community

Methods

There was an analysis made based on the correlation of trade between nations in Europe and Asia, the number of international schools in China, and the number of countries in Europe that have integrated cantonal schools.

Data and Analysis

Conclusion

Due to the influence of culture and religion in cantonal and international schools, the nations of Asia and Europe developed particular perspectives that were influenced based on their intended lifestyles. These spurred connections made in political-economic affairs, as well as harvested some disputes

Results

- China gains from being one of the largest exporters in the world as well as developing partnerships in technological advancements with Europe.
- Countries in Europe that rely heavily on economic affairs like Germany benefit from the products purchased (automotive industry flourishes)
- Disputes can also be seen in the counterargument of political affairs found between the Ukraine and Russia (pluralism and partial establishment)
